Select National Human Rights Institutions (NHRIs)

Introduction

This directory provides human rights students with a starting point in identifying professional human rights organizations and electronic mailing lists that will help keep you abreast of human rights issues and debates, including those specific to your research. The following organizations were selected because they maintain an active mailing list, to which students can subscribe. This list of organizations is not exhaustive. If you would like to make suggestions or additions, please email humanrightsed@columbia.edu.

For ease of use, the directory has been organized in sections based on 21 thematic areas. Since many of these areas are interrelated, students may find it beneficial to consult multiple sections. A multi-thematic section has also been included, which lists organizations focusing on a wide variety of human rights issues. Finally, we have included a section on National Human Rights Institutions.

Though some of the organizations included within the directory do not focus principally on human rights, they have been included since their work and updates may be relevant to some human rights students.

Many of the organizations within the directory also include internship and employment postings within their electronic newsletters, and these have been marked with an asterisk (*).

Students may also find Google's "Alert" service helpful in keeping up-to-date with specific topics, issues, or stakeholders. In order to set-up alerts, click here and sign-in to your personal Google or Columbia LionMail account. Help and tips for creating alerts can be accessed here.

N.B. ISHR does not necessarily endorse the organizations within this directory.

Select National Human Rights Institutions (NHRIs)

A National Human Rights Institution is an independent body tasked with promoting and monitoring human rights in a given country. The system of NHRIs is a developing one and not all NHRIs have a website or provide email updates. The following list is a selection of NHRIs that offer regular updates on their activities and the human rights situation in the respective country. More information on NHRIs can be found here.
